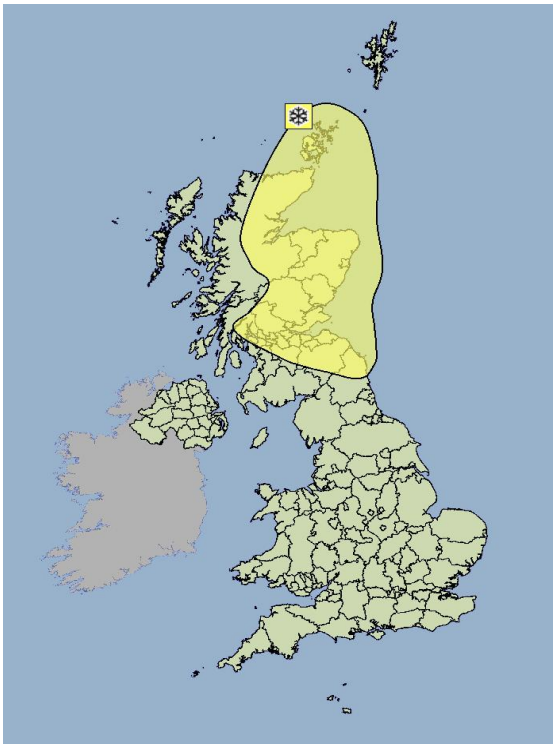
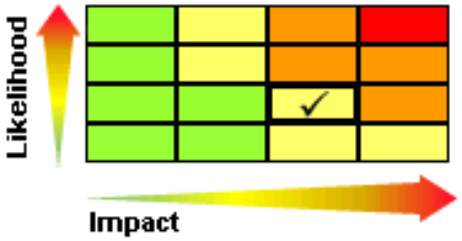
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
Frequent snow showers are likely to continue feeding in from the North Sea on a very cold easterly wind. Due to the nature of showers, some places are expected to receive an additional 5-10 cm of snow per day, whereas other places nearby may only receive small amounts. Strong winds will lead to severe drifting of lying snow in places, as well as a severe wind chill, although these are expected to begin to ease through Friday night.

This is an update to remove much of both southwest Scotland and northeast England where snow showers have largely died out.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Snow

Valid from 11:30 on Fri, 02nd Mar 2018 until 23:55 on Sat, 03rd Mar 2018

Snow showers are expected to continue over parts of northern Britain, bringing further accumulations of snow and a risk of icy stretches.

Further delays to travel and public transport could occur, whilst some rural communities could become or remain cut off. Further impacts to power supplies/mobile phone coverage are also possible.
